Acknowledgments

The organization of the conference at which the articles in this volume were first presented and the rapid publication of this first NBER Macroeconomics Annual took the cooperation of several of the ever-efficient and ever-pleasant members of the National Bureau of Economic Research's Cambridge staff and the MIT Press. Kirsten Foss and Annie Spillane at the Bureau and Christine Lamb at the MIT Press deserve special thanks.

In future issues, it will go without saying that the authors and discussants have labored hard and well to produce articles and comments on time, and even more remarkably, to send them in on time. This time it deserves to be said, for the first volume sets a high standard for the future. Readers will certainly appreciate the high quality and the interest of the articles, as well as the serious thought that has gone into many of the formal discussants' comments.

Takeo Hoshi, of the MIT Economics Department, was invaluable in the editing process, both in checking the manuscripts and in writing up the reports of the discussion. I am grateful to him, and to the informal advisory committee for this first volume, Olivier Blanchard, Rudiger Dornbusch, and Lawrence Summers. Martin Feldstein's support was essential.

Stanley Fischer