ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Among the debts I have accumulated in the course of this study, the heaviest is owed to Hal B. Lary. He was instrumental in getting the project started and was a source of continuous encouragement. His aid, ranging from advice on fundamental issues to minute details, was indeed invaluable.

I have been fortunate in being able to consult a most distinguished panel of economists, who volunteered to serve on the study's Advisory Committee: Peter B. Kenen (chairman), Arthur I. Bloomfield, J. Marcus Fleming, George Garvy, Gottfried Haberler, Charles P. Kindleberger, Irving B. Kravis, Fritz Machlup, and Robert Triffin. Their discussions, both in and outside committee meetings, have helped substantially in clarifying the framework of the study, indicating avenues of investigation, checking the findings, and improving the quality of their presentation. The present monograph has also benefited materially from the penetrating comments and constructive suggestions of the National Bureau staff reading committee, which consisted of Irving B. Kravis, Robert E. Lipsey, and Ilse Mintz. Many other colleagues at the National Bureau, in particular Phillip Cagan, have also offered valuable advice. I also wish to thank Lester V. Chandler, Walter W. Heller, and Joseph H. Willits, who comprised the reading committee of the National Bureau's Board of Directors.

I have had the opportunity to offer oral presentations of the study at various stages, and have learned much in the process. Besides staff meetings at the National Bureau, such discussions took place in seminars at the University of Chicago, Columbia University, Harvard University, M.I.T., Princeton University, Rutgers University, and the World Bank.

It is a pleasure to acknowledge my indebtedness to Maxine Nord, my research assistant in this project, for carrying out effectively and patiently the tedious task of compiling and manipulating the mass of data involved in the study; to Gerald Paul for editing the manuscript; and to H. Irving Forman for skillfully drawing the charts.

Finally, I wish to thank the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, which granted me an extended leave, and the Ford Foundation, which undertook the support of this study as part of the National Bureau's program of international economic studies. Without this combination of the essential ingredients of time and financial resources, a study of even much smaller dimensions would not have been feasible.
